

Gerunds and infinitives

English B1

What this topic teaches

When a verb acts like a thing – as the subject or object of a sentence – English gives it one of two costumes : the gerund (swimming) or the infinitive (to swim).

- I enjoy swimming. / I want to swim.
- Chinese uses the same verb form everywhere: , – no costume change at all. English forces a choice, and the first verb picks the costume.
- △ There is no logic table that covers everything. The costume is chosen by the verb before it, and the lists must be learned. The good news: the lists are short, and the exams reuse them forever.
- Memory hook: every verb has a favourite costume. enjoy only wears -ing; want only wears to. They never swap, like two stubborn grandpas.

The gerund family: verb + -ing

These verbs take the gerund: enjoy, finish, mind, avoid, keep, practise, suggest, imagine, miss.

- I enjoy reading. Have you finished eating? We practised speaking.
- Would you mind opening the window? – the politest request in Britain.
- As a subject, the gerund works alone: Swimming is fun. Learning English is a journey , not a sprint.

The infinitive family: verb + to These verbs take to + base: want, decide, hope, plan, promise, learn, afford, agree, refuse.

- I want to go. She decided to study medicine. We agreed to meet at five.
- He promised to call. I can't afford to buy it. (The classic student condition.)
- △ After to, the base form: to swim, never “to swimming”.

The meaning-changers

A few verbs accept both costumes – and the meaning changes. These are the exam's favourites.

Verb	+ -ing	+ to-infinitive
stop	stop the activity: I stopped smoking.	stop in order to: I stopped to buy water. remember	a memory of the past: I remember meeting her.	don't forget the task: Remember to call her! try	an experiment: Try adding salt.	an effort: Try to finish on time.

- I stopped smoking = no more cigarettes. I stopped to smoke = I paused my walk in order to smoke. Opposite meanings, one costume apart. Choose with care; your lungs are listening.

Watch out: traps for Chinese speakers

- △ Chinese has no costume split. Wǒ xǐhuan yóuyǒng works for everything, so “I enjoy to swim” sneaks in. enjoy only wears -ing: I enjoy swimming.
- △ Two verbs need the costume between them. “I want go” × → I want to go. The to is the bridge.
- △ suggest never takes to. “She suggested to leave early” × → She suggested leaving early. A famous exception, and exams know it.
- △ After prepositions, always -ing. interested in learning, good at swimming, thank you for coming. A preposition is a preposition; the gerund follows it like a shadow.

Say it aloud

Make five true sentences about your life, one per family.

- I enjoy watching films. I have finished pretending otherwise.
- I want to travel. I am learning to cook. I can't afford to do both this month.
- I remember meeting my best friend. I must remember to message them today.
- Try adding one English sentence to your diary tonight. Try to keep it going for a week.

Check yourself

Answer first, then read the explanation.

1. I enjoy _____ (swim). – swimming. enjoy only wears -ing.
2. She decided _____ (study) medicine. – to study. decide only wears to.
3. I stopped _____ (buy) water on the way. – to buy. Stopped in order to; the walk paused for the water.
4. “She suggested to leave early.” – $\times \rightarrow$ suggested leaving. suggest never takes to.
5. I’m interested in _____ (learn) Japanese. – learning. After a preposition, always -ing.